INTRODUCTION:

Wine may be defined as the usually fermented juice of a plant product (as a fruit) used as a beverage. In many countries wines have from time immemorial been produced from all manner of plant materials and not only from fruits.

The conversion of raw food materials into finished fermented products is often considered to be one of the best examples of “value added” processing. If this is the case, then perhaps no other process or product exemplifies this more than the fermentation of grapes into wine.

Wine making rely heavily on modern microbiology and biochemistry, traditional techniques and tried and true manufacturing practices are still important, and in many cases, necessary to produce high quality products. Thus, wine making serves not only as an example of value-added processing, but also as an example of an ancient technology that has adopted twenty-first century science.

while this is true for most wines, there are always exceptions to the rule.
